

This comment is posted with regard to the Consumer Bankers Association's challenge of Indiana's Telephone Privacy. The CBA's argument that the federal "established business relationship" should be exempted for Indiana consumers is ridiculous. If I wanted these companies to contact me after hours or over the phone to solicit, I would ask them to or indicate so in other ways. Requesting this privilege by default is preposterous, and would certainly be abused. Through "business alliances", they would probably then extend your information to their partners and on down the line, to the point where the effects of this law would be negated. That would be a shame, because I enjoy the privacy I have had since it was implemented, and wish for it to continue in its present form. Thank you.
